

Bermuda Triangle

Carl had been on vacation, on some island in the Caribbean. Carl was flying home and a businessman was sitting next to him. Carl and the businessman were engaged in a conversation.

The pilot of the plane made an announcement that they were about to fly over the Bermuda Triangle. He suggested that the passengers might want to fasten their seat belts.

This announcement infuriated the businessman. "I am not going to fasten my seat belt. What a bunch of nonsense, there is no such thing as the Bermuda Triangle." It was no longer than 15 seconds later; the plane suddenly plunged in altitude. It made a significant drop. The businessman's head crashed into the plane above him.

Carl said that the businessman seemed to have a change of attitude about the Bermuda Triangle.
